

A SELF-DISCOVERY EXERCISE IN THREE PARTS

Your Business Psychology Profile

Not a test. No right or wrong answers — just three honest choices.

Your three choices make a short code, for example 3CX.
Send the code to the consultant who shared this, and receive your personalised sample report. Most people finish in about five minutes.

by

Suresh Balachandar

Business Coach · Applied Psychologist · Entrepreneur

HOW THIS WORKS

How this works

This is not a test. There are no right or wrong answers. It is a short self-reflection exercise — three groups of descriptions, three choices.

Read each group carefully. From each group, choose the one option that feels most true to how you actually are — not how you wish you were, not how you behave at your best, but how you genuinely tend to move through life and work.

Your three choices will form a three-character code — for example, 3CX or 2AY. Send that code to the consultant who shared this with you, and they will send you a personalised sample report based on your combination — along with an invitation to a free 30-minute session to discuss it.

GROUP 1

How you engage with the world

Choose one: 1, 2, or 3

1 I go after what I want rather than waiting for it to come to me. I rely on my own drive — I do not need someone else to motivate me. I like being effective, and I want something to show for the effort I put in. I usually have several things going at once, because possibilities interest me and being boxed into one narrow track does not. And when something has to be faced, I face it — I would rather have a thing out in the open than tiptoe around it. People who know me would say I move forward. Life, to me, is something to engage with, not something to wait out.

2 My real life happens inside me. Whatever is going on around me, a good deal of my attention is turned inward — to what I am thinking, imagining or feeling — and that inner world is where things matter most. I would rather understand something properly, from a little distance, than throw myself into the middle of it. I need my own space and I guard it. Some of what goes on in me runs deep, and not everyone sees it. Pushing hard against people or situations is not my instinct; I would sooner step back, take my own route, and let things settle. I am comfortable in my own company, and I do not need to fill every moment.

3 There is always something I feel I owe — to the people around me, to my work, to doing things properly. I take what is expected of me seriously, and I would rather get something right than get it quickly. I am someone people can rely on, and I would hate to let down anyone who was counting on me. I notice when a person needs something, and I find it hard to put myself first when they do. When a decision matters, I would rather weigh it against what I know is right, or check it with someone I trust, than simply go on what I feel like. There is a voice in me that keeps asking whether I have done enough.

GROUP 2

How you handle difficulty

Choose one: A, B, or C

A When things go wrong, I look for what is still good. Dwelling on a problem drains me and does not fix it, so I turn toward what can be done and what is still ahead. I am hopeful by nature — I generally believe things will work out. When someone near me is struggling, my attention goes to them; I am often more use looking after them than sitting with my own difficulty. I would rather let a difficulty pass than make an issue of it. I do not really think of myself as someone who suffers much — I find something to look forward to, and I keep going.

B When something goes wrong, I react — and I do not hide it. I have little patience for having my reaction smoothed over, talked down, or managed. What I want from the other person is a straight response: tell me the truth, meet me in it, and do not tidy it away. Some things hit me hard and stay with me far longer than people expect. Other times it comes out fast and direct, and it is finished as quickly as it arrived. I am wary until I know where someone really stands — and once I know they are solid, I am fiercely loyal and I do not forget. I would sooner have a thing out than pretend everything is fine. Being told how I ought to feel is the surest way to get the opposite from me.

C When things go wrong, my first instinct is to stay calm and work out what to do. Reacting emotionally feels unproductive to me — it solves nothing — so I put the feeling to one side and deal with the problem. I want to understand what actually happened, decide what can be done, and get it fixed. I hold myself to a high standard, and I value competence — in myself first, and then in the people around me. I function well under pressure precisely because I can keep my feelings separate from my decisions. I may seem detached; that is not indifference, it is concentration. I am most comfortable when I know what is expected and I can meet it.

GROUP 3

What you most naturally protect

Choose one: X, Y, or Z

X My first priority — often without realising it — is my own stability and security. This is not selfishness; it is a deep, quiet orientation toward making sure that the essentials are in place. I pay attention to my health, my finances, my routines, and my personal space. When these feel secure, I can function well. When they are threatened, something in me becomes very alert. I manage my resources carefully and I plan ahead — I dislike being caught unprepared, so I like to keep something in reserve. I may not always socialise as much as others expect, because I find energy in having my own space and my own reserves — physical, financial, and emotional.

Y I am always aware of the group — who is in it, what role I play, how things are going between people. I care about belonging and about contributing to something larger than myself. I notice the dynamics in a room. I am alert to whether I am included, valued, and useful. I invest in communities, organisations, and shared causes. I like to know my place in a group — not necessarily the most important place, but a real one. I find meaning in shared effort and collective identity. When I feel out of place in a group or like I don't quite belong, it bothers me more than I usually show. Being part of something meaningful matters to me deeply.

Z My attention tends to go to the one person — or the one thing — that has captured it completely. I am not drawn to groups so much as to depth. When I connect with someone, I connect intensely. I want real conversations, real closeness, real chemistry — not surface contact. I am highly attuned to attraction in the broadest sense: what pulls me, what excites me, what I feel drawn toward. Casual social mixing doesn't satisfy me — I'd rather have one deep conversation than five shallow ones. When I am interested in someone or something, my attention narrows and intensifies; everything else fades. I feel most alive in moments of real charge — strong attraction, deep talk, focused creative work.

HOW TO SHARE YOUR RESULT

How to share your result

Combine your three choices into a single three-character code — one from each group. For example, if you chose 3 from Group 1, C from Group 2, and X from Group 3, your code is 3CX.

Send your code to the consultant who shared this questionnaire. They will send you a personalised sample report — and an invitation to a free 30-minute session where your profile is discussed in detail.

A sample exercise. This is a short self-discovery sample, not the full profiling assessment. It is meant to give you a first, honest glimpse — a starting point for the conversation.